LADIES DRESSES. - We have seldom known a season when the ladies of Baltimore appeared on the streets in richer attire than at present. They have always been proverbial for the excellent taste displayed in their outfits, but the superior quality of the goods is in marked contrast with those of recent years. Spring bonnets are of all shapes, scarcely two on a promenade bearing any resemblance, each being trimmed to suit the taste of the wearer. A lady just returned from a three years' sojourn in Europe, where full dressing is only for the parlor or drawing room or for a carriage drive, and strongly wedded to European ideas on the subject, assures us that she has seen more bright dressing on our streets since her return than during a year's residence in Paris or Vienna. A plain black silk or an alpaca dress is the almost universal street apparel in all the continental cities. There is certainly no indication of hard times or scarcity of money among the ladies, though we learn, on inquiry, that all manner of dress goods, even to silks and satins, have not been so cheap since the war as they are at the present time. This may, in a measure, account for the almost universal display of fine dresses, and we couless to a weakness in favor of seeing our streets thus brightly illuminated, over the sombre shading of the thoroughfares of Europe. -- Balt. Am.

"You are all going to hell!" shouted an Arkansas camp-meeting preacher. "That's a d-d lie; I'm going to New Orleans," said a butternut on a rear seat. But he took it all back when the preacher marched down toward him, pulling an eighteen inch bowie knife from his boot leg as he advanced.
